The shipping containers are designed to things, not human beings, and from the moment you end the architects to adapt for people who often has lagged far. But they are cheap and plentiful, and the architect Benjamin Garcia Saxe has managed to fit a couple of containers of 40 'so that humans can be very comfortable. It's also economical; The cost is around $ 40,000. The key move here is to cut almost the entire side wall of the container and set the two boxes apart enough that the spaces are now scaled appropriately, then uses the material cut from the side to make the roof, turning in a window clerestore the leading light and lets out hot air. It also takes a long time the outer walls, replacing them with glass. The result was not at all like the inside of a shipping container. Benjamin describes the process: Gabriela Calvo and Marco Peralta ever dreamed of living in their fantastic property outside the city of San Jose, where they could be with their horses and enjoy the natural scenery while it is 20 minutes from the city. They made very bold choice to explore with me the possibility of creating a very affordable housing for shipping containers neglected that allowed them to be supplied free and live the life you always wanted. It was important for me to provide them with the sunrise, the sunset, the spectacular views and the overall attempt to create a feeling of comfort and home. A roof between the two containers, made with the metal metal pieces taken to make the windows, not only creates an internal feeling of openness, but also provides a cross which is surprisingly sufficient to turn off the air conditioning. Very well done, and well photographed as well. But I wonder why e painted the BIC code of the number of the container identification. It's like taking the plates from a car? On the brown box, the missing letters are FSCU. FSCU.
