Some people look at the problems of society like poverty, and the effects he has on life, futures and entire communities, and raise their backs. "What can I do? I'm just a person", in which they believe. Social entrepreneurs look at the same problems as the company and ask: "What can I do?" Their response is that if you join forces with other people interested in innovative social entrepreneurship, which can make a lot of making positive differences to solve these problems. A social entrepreneur is a person who works to make changes for the good of society. Unlike individual activists or protesters, however, social entrepreneurs change effect through their companies, through the development of innovative programs and products with the aim of making a positive difference using business methodology. Social companies are a mixture of profit and non-profit, or businesses and charitable associations. Where he used to be that an organization was or one or another, social enterprises combine the best features and practices of both. Of course, social entrepreneurs are a heterogeneous group that cannot be defined with precision and accuracy because each one is an individual. But by its nature that they aim to achieve, share some characteristics with other social entrepreneurs. Make creative change. Social entrepreneurs are creative innovators who carry, daring ideas and methods to solve what is often familiar social problems such as poverty, hunger and lack of health care. Instead of saying a problem you can't be solved because others have tried and failed, social entrepreneurs say that it can be solved, but in this way it requires new ideas and innovations. Business experts. Many social entrepreneurs have businesswalkers and can bring their knowledge to manage their social enterprise successfully. If they don't have this knowledge, they collaborate with someone who does it. Successful companies have systems and processes to do things, and for efficient production and delivery, which has often been lacking in the non-profit sector. The application of corporate practices to solve social problems is the distinctive sign of social enterprise. Open eyes and mind. Before starting their social enterprise, social entrepreneurs do a lot of research and ask questions about a great variety of people. They do not begin with their audacious idea and decide "this is it". Social entrepreneurs are prevaricators. They don't want to waste time turn the wheels on ideas and methods that have already been shown to be poorly wise. They begin with open mind and are eager to learn continuously. Armods of research, go to their business with open eyes for problems and pitfalls á €
