NASA's Terra satellite captured this image of Norilsk, the northernmost city in Siberia, on July 21, 2000. (Image credit: NASA/GSFC/METI/ERSDAC/JAROS, and U.S./Japan ASTER Science Team) A river in Russia has turned bright red, and pictures of the spectacle are circulating on social media. The Siberian Times reported on Sept. 7 that the Daldykan River near the city of Norilsk had turned the color of blood, with locals pointing fingers at the nearby Nadezhda Metallurgical Plant, owned by the company Norilsk Nickel. In fact, a broken pipeline at the plant may be the culprit, according to a statement from the Russian Ministry of Natural Resources. The company, however, has denied any accidental discharge of pollutants. The company did not respond to Live Science's request for comment. Norilsk nickel ores have a history of environmental problems, however. In 2014, a company plant in Harjavalta, Finland, released 66 metric tons (72.7 U.S. tons) of nickel into the Kokemäenjoki River, sending nickel levels soaring far above safe limits. Finland Times reported at the time that levels in the river in the city of Pori reached 530 micrograms per liter. Safe drinking levels are below 20 micrograms per liter. The water in the Kokemäenjoki did not turn red, however. [Photos: The Strangest Places on Earth] Norilsk is no stranger to struggles with pollution. In 2007, the city appeared on the top 10 list of worst-polluted places on Earth, in a report released by the environmental group the Blacksmith Institute. The city also consistently ranks as the most-polluted city in Russia, according to government statistics. According to the Blacksmith Institute, Norilsk is home to the world's largest heavy metals smelting complex, and is the source of all this pollution. The soil around Norilsk has been so polluted that, according to NASA, it can't really be mined. It contains economically useful levels of palladium and platinum. Each year, the smelters release nearly 2 tons of sulfur dioxide into the air above Norilsk — emissions that cause acid rain and have reached as far as 124 miles (200 kilometers) away, according to a 2003 study in the Russian Journal of Ecology. (opens in new tab) A 1995 review of research on public health in Norilsk, published in the journal Science of the Total Environment, found higher-than-average rates of cancer and cancer deaths, higher-than-average rates of premature births and high rates of respiratory disease in children. A 1985 dissertation study found that children living closest to the nickel plant were 1.5 times more likely to have respiratory, ear, nose or throat diseases than those living farther away. While it remains unclear what caused the Daldykan River to flow crimson, mining and industrial processes have caused similar problems in other places. In 2015, wastewater from a long-abandoned mine in Colorado flowed into the Animas River, turning the water a striking orange color. Red waters aren't always a sign of doom and gloom. This summer, Iran's Lake Urmia turned from green to blood red as a result of microorganisms that thrive on salt and light. The Blood Falls of Antarctica get their scarlet hue from bacteria hiding out in the briny water beneath the glacier there. Salt-loving archaea microbes turn Utah's Great Salt Lake a rosy pink.
