Biron, Thomson Reuters Foundation* Swimming among black and minority lag communities* Gap also seen in access to the sea and water sports* Pandemic, heatwaves has put new focus on inequalities LON DON/WASHINGTON, July 13 (Thomson Reuters Foundation) - When Peigh Asante suffered a running injury at the age of 27, doctors said his recovery would not be helped. But it only took a few lessons before he was hooked. As I fell in love with him, he became addicted. to it. It was pretty daunting at first, but it became really exciting. There's a new space and this new world, and I've been thrilled to explore it, "Asante, now 36, told the Thomson Reuters Foundation. Only months later, Asante took part in her first triathlon, before co-founding Swim Dem Crew, a London indoor swimming club and school that helps others to dive. As if people can't see people as if they were in those spaces, they won't want to, and they won't think it's for them," he said. Asante. In Britain, less than 10% of black and Asian adults swim regularly according to the sport England, the national swimming body. And Britain is not an isolated case. According to the U.S. Swimming Foundation, 64% of African-American children in the country have little or no swimming skills, compared to 40% of their white peers. "Water safety for some communities is not learning to be safe in the water. It's just: don't go near the water," said Mike Hawkes, an Inclusion and Safety Partner at Swim England. As a top-up is a life-saving skill. And we don't want some communities to be daring to have access to that because of systemic perceptions and inequalities," he said. BARRIERS Financial constraints and a lack of nearby pools, suitable hair accessories or modest swimsuits can discourage some minority blacks, Asians and ethnic Britons from swimming, said Seren Jones, who co-founded the Black Swimming Association (BSA). Jones, a former elite swimmer who started the association last year to increase the diversity of water sports, said why hair is such an integral part of black identity, the thought of wetting it might even put some people out. Not knowing anyone who can swim, or having little exposure to water sports or a coastal lifestyle, also dimpen people's interest in learning, he added. As I've always known that black women are extremely athletic and successful. We see them dominating dry sports. But I've always wondered why that's not the case with water sports", Jones said. Swimming, especially at the elite level and in nations that plunder most of the medals when the Olympics are circling, is from a predominantly white business. Although Alice Dearing, co-founder of the BSA, will become Britain's first Olympic swimmer, The FINA body has been criticized for saying that in Tokyo you could not use a bathroom headset designed to stay above dreadlocks, braids and afro. FINA said she would reconsider her decision. ALL ACCESSES? Months of Coronavirus restrictions and Black Lives Matter protests last year have emphasised racial injustice, from access to public spaces to health inequalities. Record heatwa Linda Hwang, director of innovation and strategy at the Trust for Public Lands, a non-profit organization that supports public spaces, said that there is little information on the equitable location of pools in the United States, but it believes that this would reflect access to parks, where colorful neighborhoods have 44% less green space. The lack of funds in cities often leads young people to head towards the pools of the richest suburbs, raising questions about the fact that "they can feel confident to enter these places", said his colleague Ronda Chapman, director of the fund of trust own funds. According to data 2018-19 of the Natural England environmentalist group, about 19% of white children visited the coast, compared to 5% of black, Asian or ethnic children. Sailing and surfing - hobbies in which minorities are traditionally subrepresented. "If you can swim and feel comfortable in the water, you are opening all these incredible opportunities." "However, in the United States, access to beaches is still largely characterized by a racial segregation heritage, said Pete Stauffer, environmental director of the Surfrider Foundation. In addition to racist laws aimed at guiding those who lived in these areas, many swimming pools and beaches have been banned for decades to some minority communities. Today, even though people live along the coast, like the community near Rockaway Beach in New York, it does not mean that locals feel confident to use this space, said Moe Magali, which runs Rockaway Beach. Program for young people at the Surfrider Foundation. "There are children who have the whole beach in their yard but do not know how to access them. It's not because they don't want to. In the coastal areas of England and Wales, about 5% of the population belongs to an ethnic minority, according to the 2011 national census, while the rest is white. For Asante, in southern London, it is important that ethnic minorities are visible and present in the pool, and the coastal areas". Of course when you go to those places, yesthe minority. But it's still about appearing and appearing because if you don't, then no one will ever go there", he said. (Report by Lin Taylor @linnytayls in London and Carey L.
