Scottish fold is a cat's race with a mutation of the natural dominant gene that makes your ear cartilage contain a fold, causing the ears to fold forward and down in the direction The front of your head, which gives the cat that is often described as a "owl-like" appearance. Originally called lop-eared or just LOPS after the eared bunny-LOP, Scottish fold became the name of the race in 1966. Depending on records, long-haired scottish folds are varyingly known as Highland Fold, Scottish Fold Longhair , Longhair Double and Coupari. All folds are loaded with right ears, unfolded, and those with the fold gene will begin to show the fold usually within about 21 days. The kittens that do not develop bent ears are known as sequences. The original cats only had a fold in their ears, but due to selective creation, the creators have increased to fold for a double or triple crease that causes the ear to the totally flat lie against the head. Scottish folds, either with ears folded or with normal ears, are typically good nature and Placid and adjust to other animals inside an extremely well home. They tend to become very attached to their human caregivers and are, by nature, quite affectionate. Folds receive high notes for jokes, affection and preparation, and are often smart, loyal, Softspoken, and adaptable to family situations, people and children. Folds are also known for sleeping on your back. Scottish folds typically have soft voices and display a complex and rorronous repertory not found in better known rods. Folds are also known as sitting with their legs stretched and their paws on their belly. This is called "Buda Position".
